

A free and open internet is the single greatest technology of our time, and control should not be at the mercy of corporations. It drives entrepreneurship, protects freedom of speech, helps prevent unfair pricing practices, and so much more. Without an open internet, corporations would have tight control over how we access websites and services. That is simply not an acceptable solution. And to take this argument to its logical conclusion, we should regulate broadband Internet services as a public utility, similar to the way electricity, gas and water are regulated, along with limiting providers and regulating the options those providers can offer
